

Questions About Your Child's Development?

You know your child best. We're here to help.

Every child develops in their own way and at their own pace. If you notice challenges that are making everyday activities harder for your child, it may be helpful to get extra support.

⇒ You may consider reaching out when your child: ⇐

Has difficulty with everyday activities

Such as self-care (dressing, feeding), playing, using hands, moving their body, or communicating their needs.

You have ongoing concerns

About how your child is developing with movement, coordination, communication, learning, social skills, behavior, or sensory needs.

Struggles more than other children

You notice that your child finds certain activities much harder than other children their age.

Someone has raised a concern

A teacher, caregiver, relative, or your pediatrician has noticed something that may need extra support.

Becomes easily frustrated or avoids activities

Your child may get upset, shut down, or refuse to try things that seem difficult.

You just have questions

Trust your instincts. Reaching out early can help your child build skills and confidence that last a lifetime.

You don't have to know which therapy your child needs.

You don't need a diagnosis or a referral to get started.

We're happy to talk with you, listen to your concerns, and help you figure out the next best step.
